The Lost Pines Art Center serves as a new home and exhibition space for the community arts cooperative The Lost Pines Art League. Located on a remediated brownfield site at the edge of the historic downtown Bastrop, Texas, it provides facilities and support for local artists, as well as art education for the Central Texas community at large. In addition, The Lost Pines Art Center provides a community gathering space to celebrate local artists and share their work. The program called for a mix of open and multipurpose spaces for gallery events, exhibitions, and community events, as well as smaller, more intimate spaces for classrooms, studios and offices for the organization.

Designed to make extensive use of natural light, the building includes an entire row of clerestory windows, providing some of the best lighting for both wall art and sculpture. In addition, they provide a striking image during the day and at night, acting as a beacon and landmark for the newly restored and reinvigorated historic downtown district redevelopment.

The main building is the first of a multi-phase development plan that includes repurposing the existing grain silos into additional studio space and workshops, an outdoor amphitheater, gardens and additional community gathering spaces.
